Three pregnancies occurred with choriocarcinoma in situ (CCIS) after fertility treatment and two spontaneously. Distinct ultrasonographic signs of CCIS were seen in two pregnancies in which nuchal translucency (NT) measured more than 2.5 mm and in one with a NT of 3.1 mm. Prenatal screening for abnormalities was performed in three cases and in two fetuses with distinct velocities in the nuchal cord. In one case the diametral spinal cord diameter was increased. In the two cases with an NT of 3.1 and 2.9 mm, both fetuses showed a normal result. In the other case the diametral spinal cord diameter was still increased. Two were delivered by cesarean section due to a breech presentation in one case and oligohydramnion in the other case. The third pregnancy was terminated at 15 weeks' gestation because of the abnormal ultrasound results. The two surviving fetuses showed no major anomalies. Although ultrasonographic findings are nonspecific, we consider that the CCIS should be suspected if a fetus shows certain ultrasonographic findings, such as an enlarged NT, abnormal velocities in the nuchal cord or an increase in the diametral spinal
